A HUNTING TRIP IN THE FLORIDA EVERGLADES

A. D. Gilley, Formerly of Barre, Describes Such a Trip Made by Him During the Past Winter.

I had been spending the winter of 1905 with my wife in Daytona, Fla., and after about two months of the same daily routine I began to get uneasy and anxious for something in the way of novelty.

Being interested in a farm located on the south fork of the New River near Fort Lauderdale, Fla., on the edge of the Everglades, and having been advised by our manager that there was excellent hunting and fishing there, I invited a friend, Charles F. Powers of Grand Rapids, Mich., to accompany me, so for several days prior to our departure we were engaged in collecting the necessary paraphernalia for such a trip and on Sunday, March 12th, we took the morning train from Daytona and went to Palm Beach, where we stopped over a train, then took the evening train for Fort Lauderdale, arriving there at about 11:30 that night.

I was awakened the next morning about six o'clock by Powers shaking me and asking me to come to the window, as he had something to show me. Looking out there was a Seminole Indian with his family of five or six pickaninies, their costumes being most striking. The woman had on a loose skirt of cheap cotton material and a loose cape of the same material over the shoulders. The man wore a print shirt reaching nearly to his knees, legs and feet being bare. The children were dressed, or rather undressed, in much the same way. They were at the station waiting to see the early morning train come in.

I said to Powers: "Let us dress as quickly as possible and go over and see if he won't take us on a hunting trip into the Everglades."

The idea seemed to take him favorably, so we hurried into our clothes and went out. We were not long in locating the Indian and when we had made known our wishes we couldn't get any better news from him than a rather negative shake of the head. Later in the forenoon, while he was in the general store making some purchases, we got one of the clerks to interpret for us; at first he was very reticent, but when we displayed a $5 bill he asked by signs when we wanted to go and for how long. Then pointing to the sun in the east, he told us to be about two hours high and then in the west for about two hours before sunset and saying: "Sun here, sun there," the clerk finally got his consent to come for us the next day at between eight and nine o'clock.

We congratulated ourselves on our success, but later in the day we were told by the natives that it was extremely doubtful if he came for us, as they were suspicious of the white people and had very little to do with them, as during the Seminole war Osceola, their chief, was captured by the whites, the violation of the laws of a flag of truce.

The next morning we had about given up seeing our Indian and were making arrangements with a man who was both a hunting and fishing guide to take us on a trip when we looked down the river and saw the Indian leisurely paddling in his long canoe. He came to our landing and with joyous anticipation we loaded our guns, fishing tackle and lunches and started on our trip into the Everglades.

In order that the privilege we were about to enjoy may be fully understood, I want to make a little digression. By the white men comparatively little is known of the Everglades, many expeditions in the way of research have been made, but these have always been attended by hardships and failure, and while the Indians themselves are familiar with all the waterways and canals, yet they will not guide these expeditions.

At the present time there are about 1,200 Seminoles and they live in small shacks, all open at the sides and roofed over by palmetto leaves. They live on small islands in and the land adjacent to the Everglades. They are without ambition and content with the lot in degree, getting their living mostly by hunting and fishing.

Fort Lauderdale is an old Indian trading post and I was told that they often brought in the skins of the otter and alligators to the amount of several hundred dollars a year. The Indians changed at the stores for provisions, then, after buying all the whiskey they could get their hands on, they would loaf about the town for several days and have a regular spree, then go back into the Everglades and remain there as long as their provisions held out. On leaving our farm we started up the river we hadn't gone far when we started two water turkeys, Powers, who was sitting in the stern of the boat, brought his gun to his shoulder and fired one barrel and his bird dropped; then, quickly changing aim to the angle of the other barrel, he fired and to the surprise of our guide brought down the second bird. Soon after that we started two wild ducks, and much to my own surprise, I repeated Powers' performance.

Up to this time our guide had hardly spoken a word and the same cold expression had remained on his face, but now he smiled and in his way expressed his appreciation of our marksmanship.

The most of the Seminoles have for American names such as the following: "Charley Tommy," "Charley John," "Charley Tiger," in most cases the prefix being "Charley." As Powers' name was Charley, our Indian, whose name was Charley Tommy, said: "Your name Charley Water Turkey," so Charley Water Turkey will stick for some time.

On this trip we killed several ducks and many other birds, saw grass, and alligators, besides seeing a great many birds of rare and beautiful plumage, which we were not allowed to shoot. When we ate our lunch that day we were well into the Everglades, where the saw grass rose several feet above our heads and nothing but saw grass could be seen as far as the eye could reach. We came back into the river by another canal or waterway, and finally reached the farm about five o'clock in the afternoon.

As the Indian was going into camp the next day, he invited us to meet him down where the north and south forks of the river meet, and go to his camp and he would take us on a hunting trip for large game on the edge of a cypress swamp, so on the following day at about 10 o'clock we took one of our colored laborers from the farm to row for us and met our Indian, who was accompanied by another Seminole, Charley Tiger by name.

After going about four miles up the river, or the north fork of the river, the Indians paddled to the bank and made a landing. Charley Tommy pitched his tent and then left his squaw to unload the canoe, and we started on a trip that was not only attended by discomfort and inconvenience, but considerable danger. At first I was somewhat nervous about snakes and called on Adam, our colored man, to keep near me with his rifle. The Indians are natural born hunters and while they glide rapidly through the forests and swamps, nothing ever escapes their eye. They are always alert and seem tireless, too. Walking in their bare feet, with an easy graceful swing, they cover a lot of ground and make it somewhat hard for a tenderfoot to keep up with them.

On this trip we saw indications of all kinds of large game, such as deer, wildcats, panthers and wild turkeys, but were too late in the day to do much shooting, as the animals come to the swamp to drink mostly in the early part of the day.

We got back to camp late at night, prior to our departure we had been on tramp, but feeling well paid for any inconvenience we had been subjected to. The Indians gave us an urgent invitation to come the following year and they would take us on a week's hunting trip to the Big Cypress Swamp, and sometime we are in hopes to avail ourselves of this invitation, as it would be an experience vouchsafed to few white men.

THE HOUSE.

The house is being ripped from bottom to the top. And all the rippers work. As though 'twere sin to stop. As soon as breakfast's through The trouble is begun And night's far gone before There's rest for anyone.

The woman of the house, Of course, is in command. And sons and daughters aid In tasks that she has planned. And though poor hubby thinks He has enough to do, When he comes home from work He has to pitch in, too.

Poor hubby has to take The carpet from each floor, And he assaults the tacks Until his hands are sore. But when he isn't watched He gets a frenzied grip, And up the carpet comes With one terrific rip.

Poor hubby has to take The pictures from the walls, And often up and down A wobbly ladder crawls. And from the windows he Must bring the curtains down, Though there is constant risk Of fracturing his crown.

A hundred irksome jobs Poor hubby has to do, And thankful he will be When all such stunts are through. For though the wife gets praise For diligence and care, When moving time comes 'round, Poor hubby does his share.
